ABSTRACT

To determine the linguistic structure of the Appalachian region, 9 interviewees from each of 13 states (Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Maryland, New York, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia) were chosen by selected criteria. The interviewees were classified as rustic, modern, and cultured speakers. Hour-long participant interviews were conducted, with a total of 117 hours of spoken discourse being taped. The data consisted of 471,656 words. The data analysis provided: (1) an alphabetized list of words and their frequency by respondent; (2) an overall alphabetized list of the data with word frequency for the region; (3) an overall alphabetized word frequency list of misused words and their correct forms; and (4) an overall alphabetized word frequency list of colloquial terms and their explanations. From the tables obtained, a list of corrected functional vocabulary was prepared by state and types of speaker. There was an overall variation of 19.4 percent of Appalachian English from the standard English, which led to the conclusion that there is a distinct pattern of linguistic structure in the region. The author wishes to express his very sincere gratitude to the many people whose support, guidance and encouragement were invaluable during the development and preparation of this disseration.

Very special acknowledgments are extended to the following people:

To Dr. George F. Aker, Chairman of the Doctoral Committee, for his support and encouragement not only during the development of this research but also the graduate work leading to the degree.

To Dr. Wayne L. Schroeder, Dr. Andrew Hendrickson and Dr. Edwin Smith, members of the Doctoral Committee, for their assistance and guidance in seeing this project to completion.

To Dr. Roy J. Ingham for his invaluable assistance and guidance during the author's stay at Florida State University.

To Mr. George W. Eyster, Executive Director of the Appalachian Adult Basic Education Demonstration Center at Morehead State University in Morehead, Kentucky, and my colleagues at this center for their sincere cooperation and devotion to the objectives of the study.

To Dr. John Sherk and Dr. B. K. Singh of the University of Missouri, Kansas City, Missouri, and Virginia

Commonwealth University, Richmond, Virginia, respectively for their consultation and help during the study and analysis of the data.

To the interviewers, Mrs. Sharon Willis, Miss Diane Cassity, Miss Karen Cole, and Mr. Rick Collis, who helped in the collection of data.

To Mrs. Carolyn Martin whose continuous devotion in the management of the study, transcribing the tapes, and typing the manuscript was of great help.

To Mrs. Mary McCoy for typing the final draft, meeting administrative deadlines and friendly assistance during my graduate program.

To my parents, Begum and Agha Zafar H. Qazilbash, who taught me to see beyond the continental horizons and sent me abroad to pursue higher education.

Sincere and deepest appreciation is reserved for the author's wife, Karla, and our two children, Yasmine and Anwar. We pursued the dream as a family and we are equally responsible for its fulfillment.

Abstract

A DIALECT SURVEY OF THE APPALACHIAN REGION

By

A. Husain Qazilbash

Major Professor, Dr. George F. Aker

The purpose of this research was to:

1. Determine the linguistic structure of the Appalachian Region in terms of functional vocabulary, misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary. An overall list of misused words, their corrected forms, colloquial terms and their explanations was developed.

2. Determine the relationship between education, urban contact and media contact and functional vocabulary, misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary.

3. Determine the relationship of age, sex, and income to functional vocabulary, misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary.

To determine the linguistic structure of the Appalachian region nine interviewees from each of thirteen states were chosen by selected criteria. The nine interviewees were classified as rustic, modern and cultured speakers. The term rustic referred to speakers older in age with minimum education, the term modern was used for younger persons with high school education or its equivalent, and the term cultured referred to speakers with a college education with no age restrictions.

An hour long participant interviews were conducted, and a total of 117 hours of spoken discourse was taped. Each tape was transcribed and all words from the transcripts were punched on computer cards. The data consisted of 471,656 words.

Data were transferred to magnetic tapes yielding the following analysis: (1) An alphabetized list of words and their frequency by respondents, providing the functional vocabulary of each respondent; (2) an overall alphabetized list of the data with word frequency for the region; (3) an overall alphabetized word frequency list of misused words and their correct forms; (4) an overall alphabetized word frequency list of colloquial terms and their explanations. From the tables thus obtained a list of corrected functional vocabulary was prepared by state and types of speaker (functional vocabulary minus misused words + colloquial terms).

It was hypothesized that rustic speakers have a smaller functional vocabulary than modern and cultured speakers and modern speakers have a smaller vocabulary than the cultured speakers. The hypothesis was supported only in six of the thirteen states. The variations in average functional vocabulary were greatest among rustic speakers and least for cultured speakers. Respondents in the state of Kentucky had the lowest functional vocabulary. Sub-regional differences generally implied provide no interpretive explanation for the Appalachian linguistic structure.

It was hypothesized that rustic speakers will misuse more words than modern speakers and modern speakers will misuse more words than cultured speakers. In general the data supported the hypothesis.

The hypothesis that the more highly educated individual would be prone to use colloquial terms was generally supported by the findings of the study.

It was hypothesized that a person's corrected functional vocabulary would increase with an increase in the degree of his linguistic sophistication. This hypothesis was supported with 92 percent predictability and 80 percent agreement respectively.

The first order partial correlation on the characteristics of the participants did not produce any additional information except in case of income. Income was found to be related to functional vocabulary in case of age. It appears that younger people have more education than older people. Sex was not related to education. There was an overall variation of 19.4 percent of Appalachian English from the standard English which leads us to believe that there is a distinct pattern or linguistic structure throughout the Appalachian Region without any sub-regional differences within the region.

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

No language has ever been able to survive unless rooted in common speech. Since language is a product of the human mind and the human vocal organs, it follows the ways of the human brain and the human larynx.

Language is intimately related to being human, for when we study language we are to a remarkable degree studying human nature. Similarly, we expect language to be what it is because human beings are what they are. But we should not expect to study language by making inferences from other fields of study. Language is rooted in every culture with certain generalized principles of its own.

Words have many usages and unless we are sure in what sense a word is being used, we are likely to misunderstand one another. Many serious arguments, even fights and wars, grow out of misunderstandings which can be attributed to improper usage of words. Our language is so lacking in precision that communication with an exactitude is often impossible.

If exact communication could be achieved we would find ourselves in greater harmony. If a universal language were feasible, it would promote the precise use of language. But the universal use of such a language would impose serious questions. Nobody would be willing to use such a language and nobody could use it even if he wanted to, as it would ignore human nature and fundamental principles of human language. In short, such a language could not be used for many reasons, mainly because it ignores the nature of the human mind, and the mind expresses itself in language. We have no difficulty in distinguishing between two words because there are differences in form and sound with which to associate differences in meaning.

It is generally understood that a person's language is affected by his education, contact with media, outside world and other variables which tend to determine his linguistic structure.

When the Appalachian dialect and culture are considered, the process of teaching the disadvantaged takes on an entirely different character. Instead of being inattentive, lazy or mentally deficient, the disadvantaged Appalachian, who has failed and remained undereducated according to national standards, will be seen as living with two conflicting norms of behavior, the Appalachian culture and the wider culture.

In terms of language an Appalachian is not so much likely to be verbally deficient as he is to be confused by the differences between his own dialect and the standard English taught in the classrooms, because his non-standard dialect is a variety of English. Similarities between an Appalachian's dialect and standard English make it especially difficult for the Appalachian to be sure of himself.

Statement of the Problem

Many researchers have demonstrated that differences in pronunciation, grammar, and vocabulary prevent effective teacher communication and development of reading skills, e.g., Allen, Allen, Atlastis, Fries, and Holland.[1]

In communicating with each other, we share a common pattern called language. A language is not merely a verbalization but also includes parameters of para and meta communications. This study is primarily concerned with (1) verbalization of language in terms of how it might affect the process of communication and (2) the identification of factors which determine the Appalachian linguistic structure.

The setting of this study is the Appalachian region. The people of the region presumably speak a somewhat different type of English as compared to "standard English." Basically these differences are identifiable in terms of intonation, words, syntactical and semantical structures.

It is assumed that when an Appalachian adult goes beyond the limits of his own linguistic boundaries, he faces certain communication problems. For example, (1) the tendency to use colloquial terms which are common to the Appalachian region but which are not used in the same sense outside the region; (2) misused words which often give different meanings to the words and diminish the effectiveness of the message; (3) certain words which are common in the vocabulary of Appalachian people at all levels are not understood clearly outside the region. These problems are not created by the Appalachian, but are due to a lack of comprehension on the part of the encoder and decoder in the communication process.

This study was aimed at determining and describing (1) what may be called a generalized pattern of the Appalachian dialect as compared to "standard English" and (2) some associated variables which affect the linguistic sturcture of an Appalachian.

Significance of the Study

Bi-dialecticalism and bi-lingualism are the phenomena in which all individuals, when presented with a stimulus in one dialect (and asked to respond) will respond in the form which is native to their own dialect rather than in the form of the original stimulus. The substitution of native forms includes not only features of phonology, but extends to vocabulary and syntax as well. Such responses seem to give unequivocal evidence that the person has an adequate receptive knowledge of the stimulus dialect, and that he performs instantaneous translation from that dialect into his native dialect.

This phenomenon occurs only if a person has already well developed receptive knowledge of a more formal or mainstream dialect of the language; much of the instructional task can be seen as guiding him toward an automatic productive control of the "mainstream" dialect rather than having to teach it to him from scratch. Implicit in this approach is the idea that only positive stimuli and motivations will be supplied to lead him to develop and to practice his control and that no negative values or stigmas will be applied to his use of native linguistic forms.

When an adult enters an adult education class for the first time, he may come in contact with a new subculture or a totally new culture. In many instances, he has to undergo a rapid and sometimes traumatic acculturation--often with little guidance. If the features of an Appalachian's nature, culture, and language are accepted in the classes, he will find his language an instrument that will save him in his own environment. Even where he escapes this fate, he may discover that his linguistic skills do not serve him adequately in meeting the demands of the new environment; and so, baffled and frustrated, he may withdraw his energies and cease to try.

Learning in standard English, or any dialect which is outside the immediate speech community of the disadvantaged adult, needs to be understood. This will help in sturcturing the experience of a new language or dialect in such a way as to optimize the chances for internalization and then make sure that sufficient opportunity is provided for intensive practice in the new patterns so that they become fixed and automatic. Since language is the most important tool for adapting to a new cultural environment, it is imperative that comprehesive knowledge be provided and equivalence in other dialects be given as rapidly as possible.

One of the most important objectives of this study is not only to provide the learner with positive stimuli but also to make the teachers of adult education in Appalachia realize that all languages spoken by more than one person have dialects. Dialects arise by natural processes beyond the reach of coercive methods of control and are specific to particular areas. There is no such thing as a standard language as contrasted with dialects. There are only more or less culturally valued or socially prestigious dialects and more or less formal dialects of a language.

CHAPTER II

REVIEW OF RELATED RESEARCH

Linguistics has stressed the importance of learning good pronunciation to such an extent that it may be said that emphasis on accurate phonological learning is an essential aspect of contemporary language teaching methods.

Sherk's Kansas City study of Negro inner city Head Start Children showed that differences in dialect prevented the effective development of reading skills.[1]

The studies of Ferster and Sapon[2] and Carroll[3] which demonstrate the fact that young children are strikingly better than adults in acquiring a native-like accent in a second language have led to the widely-held belief, that they are equally superior in other aspects of language learning; this has by no means been verified.

[3] J. B. Carroll, "Wanted: A Research Basis for Educational Policy on Foreign Language Teaching," Harvard Educational Review, Vol. 30 (1960), pp. 128-140.

A number of studies in teaching second languages are available which substantiate the claims that pronunciation, grammar, and vocabulary differences prevent reading development skills. For a person who hopes (or is expected) to communicate with others effectively, a reasonably good approximation to the accepted pronunciation of Standard English is necessary.

Investigations by Nida,[1] Licklider and Miller,[2] Miller and Nicely,[3] Lundeen,[4] Politzer,[5] Starr,[6] and Hockett[7] emphasize that differences in pronunciation present both amusing and tragic errors in communication and that a need for thorough research in the field of phonology which will make the pronunciation difference known to the teachers and students will help in the process of communication and will also facilitate the development of reading skills.

The difference in the traditional, local or regional dialect and standard English causes problems of interference in certain aspects of language learning such as reading and prevents those persons who speak the local dialect from attaining the level of communication skill which is required by the larger society.

Studies concerning the effect of the structure of language on learning have shown that "consistent" language structures appear in the dialect form. Horowitz demonstrated that learners have a tendency to make "errors" by following analogous patterns.[1] Berko[2] demonstrated that errors in grammar are largely due to correct use of "analogies" which happen to lead them to incorrect forms.

The development of vocabulary depends to some extent upon the interest of the individual and the kinds of subjects being taught. In addition, such methods as teaching vocabulary in context or pairing with glosses" are also used. However, the questions of common usage and meaningfulness are also important in this regard.

Noble[1] defined meaningfulness in terms of the number of associations which subjects are likely to give in a short period of time. Noble and McNeely[2] (1957) found that the "meaningfulness" of nonsense syllables is related to the ease with which they are learned.

Underwood and Schultz[3] have indicated that "meaningfulness" as it is interpreted is a measure of the frequency with which a stimulus has been experienced or a response emitted. To them, rate of verbal learning consists of two stages: first, a "response-learning or response-recall phase" during which the responses are learned as responses and in a recall sense, become readily available, and second, an association or hookup phase in which the response is associated with its corresponding stimulus. The second stage appears to be facilitated when the stimuli and responses have many associates. The above studies suggest that in teaching or learning vocabulary an attempt should be made to generate as many common associations as possible for the items to be learned and that for successful teaching of English, local dialect words should be checked and explained in the broader context of standard English. Thus one of the aims of the present study is to make a list of such words, the frequency of their occurrance and the meaning of such words in terms of the regional dialect. It is hoped that teachers will consult these data and find them useful in increasing the rate and the meaningfulness of their students' reading development.

The first systematic study of the geography of American speech was done in New England by Kurath.[1] Though the complete linguistic survey of the United States is not yet available, the ones available and more closely related to the present survey are as follows.

1. The Linguistic Atlas of the Middle Atlantic and South Atlantic States includes the linguistic surveys of New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, North and South Carolinas. Originally two separate atlases were planned for four northern and six southern states but later the two groups were combined.

2. The Linguistic Atlas of North-Central States. Marckwardt started the linguistic survey of Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois,

[1] Hans Kurath, et al., Linguistic Atlas of New England (3 vols.; Providence, R. I.: American Council of Learned Societies, 1939-43).

Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio for the Linguistic Atlas of the North-Central States. Prior to this survey it was considered that the English spoken in this area was so uniform that it could be simply classified as General American English. But this idea has now been proven false; regional differences within the North-Central states do exist as they do in all other parts of the United States.[1]

3. The Linguistic Atlas of the Inland South includes the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and West Georgia . Here also a different trend has been adopted. The Louisiana State University has been gathering data for the state of Louisiana. Work in Oklahoma has been completed by the Oklahoma State University.

Kurath in his book, "A Word Georgraphy of the Eastern United States," has classified the United States into three distinct dialect boundaries based on closely knit sounds of isoglosses, consistent pronunciations, vocabulary and grammar. This classification was based on (1) historical facts and geographic developments of the United States, (2) the migration of people from Europe into the New England states, and (3) the later migration of these immigrants to the West. Following is the general classification of Kurath's three dialect areas.

[1] A. H. Marckwardt, "The Linguistic Atlas of North-Central States", University of Alabama Press, Series 39, 1963.

Kurath's second classification of midland dialect includes central and southern Pennsylvania, northern Delaware, and the areas of Pennsylvania settlement on the Delaware, Susquehanna Valley, and the southern Appalachian and the upper Piedmont areas of North and South Carolina. Moving westward to the North Central states area we find North Midland forms and Midland forms in central Ohio, central and northern Indiana and southern Illinois. Furthermore, because of the migrations north on the Mississippi River, south Midland forms are also found in parts of the upper Midwestern states: the mining regions of northwestern Illinois, southwestern Wisconsin, and southern Iowa. Texas also shares a good amount of Midland dialect.

Some typical examples of Midland dialect are:

Pronunciation:

/r/ is kept after vowels

/e/ in Mary and dairy

/o/ regularly in with

The recognized areas of southern dialect are on the Atlantic Seaboard, Delmarvia (the eastern shore of Maryland and Virginia and southern Delaware) southward into the Virginia Piedmont, northeastern North Carolina, eastern South Carolina, Georgia and Florida, on the Gulf Coast, central and southern Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas. In the North-central states, southern dialect is found in Kentucky, especially western Kentucky. Southern dialect forms also appear in California, but very rarely.

Some typical examples of Southern dialect are·

Pronunciation:

/r/ is lost except before vowels

/ey/ in Mary

/r/ in Mrs.

Vocabulary:

Carry "escort," take harp, Mouth harp "harmonica"

turn of wood "armload of wood"

Grammar:

CHAPTER III

THEORETICAL FRAMEWORK

Each individual's speech is as distinct as his fingerprints. Each person has his own idiolect, his own individual dialect..... Actually we cannot repeat a single sound identically even once.[1] Idiolects group into many dialects. Each dialect refers to a variety of language spoken by a distinct group of people. People united by a dialect form a speech community.

Speech communities develop sayings, proverbs, and denotative and connotative meanings of words that are incomprehensible to outsiders.

People also form their own dialect patterns of pronunciations, grammar, and vocabulary. Dialect as previously defined was regarded as a corrupt form of standard language or a customary speech within a social class.[2]

In the nineteenth century some people valued a "Harvard Accent," the New England dialect of Boston and Cambridge. Since this area was the seat of learning, literature, and wealth, the dialect was imitated.

[2] Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary (2nd ed.; Springfield, Mass.: G. & C. Merrian Co., 1965), p. 228.

During the past three hundred years of American history a continuous flow of migrants from all parts of the world has imported many dialects to the United States. This has prevented one dialect of American English from being recognized as a national standard dialect. But dialect is thought of differently today. No regional dialect predominates as "correct"; consequently, the dialect situation is complex and interesting.

Because of the great distances in the United States, persons in every region or area have developed their own dialect or pattern of speech or speech community. For purposes of better communication, understanding, and recognition, each speech community is studied by researchers according to the boundaries which are unified historically, politically, geographically, religiously, or socially. Not only in English, but in other languages, researchers have developed Linguistic Atlases. These Linguistic Atlases are the source of information about the geographic dialects.

Many researchers have demonstrated that the differences in pronunciation, grammar, and vocabulary and their understanding are directly related to reading, e.g., Holland,[1] Smith, Allen, and Fries.[2] Smith in his book,

[1] Holland, op. cit.

[2] Edwing H. Smith, Literacy Education for Adolescents and Adults (San Francisco, California: Boyd Fraser Publishing Co., 1970); Allen, Teaching English as a Second Language; Fries, Teaching and Learning English as a Foreign Language.

Literacy Education for Adolescents and Adults, states that "introductory reading should be within the scope of the student's known and habitual language." [1]

William Stewart, in Language and Communication Problems in Southern Appalachia, concludes that although it is important to recognize the ecological, sociological, and ethnic differences within Appalachian society, no comprehensive educational program for the region will be effective unless it takes into account the differences in dialect.[2] This is the case with language teaching, since all of these variables have a direct correlation with language usage and language variation.

Adult educators who have faced the problem of language in Appalachia emphasize the cultural and social dimensions of language learning as they affect the disadvantaged. It is important that, at all times, we pay attention to the language which an Appalachian brings to adult basic education class, whether it is language which differs altogether from that taught in the class or a dialect which differs only in a few points of phonology and morphology from that which serves as the medium of instruction. Whatever the Appalachian's language may be, he has worked it out for himself and it is a marvelous intellectual achievement as an adaptive mechanism for communication within a specific social and cultural environment.

[1] Smith, op. cit., pp. 129-137.

[2] William Stewart (Washington, D.C.: Center for Applied Linguists, 1967).

In summary, it should be noted that the linguistic structure of an Appalachian will be affected by how much education he has, how frequently he travels to urban areas, and how much contact he has with a major socializing agent of language, namely the mass media. Undoubtedly, any individual tends to incorporate new words as they come along in his experience and the factors mentioned above provide situations where an individual is exposed to new words.

It may be contended that these variables can explain most of the variations in an individual's functional vocabulary, colloquial terms, and the use of words.

In addition, such biosocial factors as age, sex, and income provide conditions for establishing the causal sequence.

Definition of Terms

Idiolect

"The language or speech pattern of an individual at a particular period of his life."[1]

Dialect

> A variety of language that is used by one group of persons and has features of vocabulary, grammar, and pronunciation distinguishing it from other varieties used > by other groups or a local or regional variety of languages distinguished by features of vocabulary, grammar, and pronunciation from other local or regional varieties and constituting together with them a single language of which no single variety is standard.[1]

Appalachia

> When used in its broadest sense, the term Appalachia usually refers to an immense portion of the mid-Eastern portion of the United States one which includes all of West Virginia, the eastern thirds of Kentucky and Tennessee, and adjacent parts of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, New York, and Mississippi. Yet in spite of the fact that the Appalachian region is dissected by a number of state boundaries, there are still at least two good reasons for considering it a single entity. The first reason is geographic; the region consists of a continuum of virtually uninterrupted mountain chains and hills. The second reason is cultural; there exists within the mountains and hills a special kind of American, usually referred to as the Southern Highlander, or Southern Mountaineer.[2]
> A common geographic and national origin before migration to Appalachia, plus the effect of similar ecological factors throughout the area of settlement, had led to the maintenance of a rather uniform mountain culture which, even today, results in the striking similarity between individuals living as far apart as the coal mines of western Pennsylvania and the hills of northern Alabama.[3]

Linguistic Structure

This term refers to the total speech pattern of an individual which includes his functional vocabulary, colloquial terms used, and misused words.

Hypotheses

In order to explain variations in the linguistic structure of the Appalachian population, the major hypothesis of the present study is:

> There is no relationship between the independent variables (education, urban contact, and media-contact) and the dependent variables (functional vocabulary, frequency of misused words and frequency of colloquial terms).

The following sub-hypotheses were tested in order to test the major hypothesis.

1) There is a positive relationship between education and functional vocabulary.

2) There is a negative relationship between education and the frequency of misused words.

3) There is a negative relationship between education and the frequency of colloquial terms used.

4) There is a positive relationship between outside contact and functional vocabulary.

5) Thereis a negative rlationshiop between media contacts and the frequency of misused words.

6) There is a negative relationship between outside contacts and the frequency of colloquial terms.

7) There is a positive relationship between media contacts and functional vocabulary.

8) There is a negative relationship between media contacts and the frequency of misused words.

9) There is a negative relationship between media contacts and the frequency of colloquial terms.

CHAPTER IV

METHODOLOGY

Introduction

The purpose of this chapter is to present the procedures followed in conducting the investigation. These procedures include (1) definition of the population, (2) selection of participants, (3) selection and training of interviewers, (4) collection of data, and (5) analysis of data.

Population

Almost every investigator of linguistic research has sought to cover three types of informants, to ensure the maximum coverage of the language, and to increase the possibility of pronunciation, grammar, and vocabulary occurrences at all levels of language usage in the community under study.

The definition of population selected for this study is the one given by McDavid,[1] who defined the types of subjects that were sought and used by Kurath in his studies.

Instead of seeking speakers of the "local dialect," Kurath sought three local cultural types who were alike only in naturalness and utterance and in identification with their community for at least two generations:

[1] Raven McDavid, Jr., "The Sociology of Language," National Society for the Study of Education Yearbook, ed. by Albert H. Marckwardt (Illinois: University of Chicago, 1970), p.35.

1. In every community an attempt was made to interview a representative of the oldest living native generation who had a minimum of formal education, travel and other outside interference.
2. In every community an attempt was made to interview a middle-aged speaker who had a high school education and somewhat greater reading, travel, and general sophistication than the older generation.
3. Finally in about one community of every five, workers interviewed a cultivated speaker, who was usually a college graduate and a member of one of the oldest families--presumably a representative of the best of local cultural traditions.

Based on Kurath's three criteria, this investigation sought nine subjects from each of the Appalachian states and divided these nine subjects as follows:

1. Three older subjects (50 years or over) who had a minimum of formal education.
2. Three middle age subjects (between 25-50 years of age) who had a high school education or who completed the high school equivalency diploma in an adult basic education program.
3. Three subjects who had a college degree or equivalent formal training and cultivated speech with no age restrictions.

Selection of Participants

Participants in the study were selected with the assistance of one adult basic education teacher, supervisor, or state director in each of the thirteen Appalachian states of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Maryland, New York, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia. After an initial telephone contact, a letter was sent to each person confirming the telephone conversation and describing the criteria for the selection of the participants. Participants were selected according to the criteria and a time, date, and place were established for interviews. The participant sample consisted of nine participants from each state, three in each category--rustic, modern, and cultured.

Selection and Training of Interviewers

The four interviewers selected for this study were graduate students at Morehead State University. Two were male and two were female, and all were native white Appalachians having strong backgrounds in the social sciences. The interviewers were selected to facilitate conversation and avoid any inhibitions that participants might exhibit during the interviews.

The above precautions were considered important and were based on sociological studies which suggested that Appalachians have a fear of strangers and are doubtful of outsiders.[1]

After the selection of interviewers, each interviewer was given three days of comprehensive training in interviewing techniques. They were provided with several documents on interviewing which were read and discussed during the training sessions. The researcher also arranged for a professional audio-visual person to demonstrate and provide extensive practice in the use of tape recorders.

[1] Weller, op. cit., pp. 102-112.

Collection of Data

After completing all necessary arrangements, the researcher along with the four interviewers visited each state. Hour long interviews were scheduled with each participant. It was anticipated that during a period of one hour each participant would talk for approximately 40 minutes at a speed of seventy-five words per minute, thus providing a sample of approximately 3,000 words per interview.

The time, place and date of the interviews were fixed according to the convenience of the participants. Some interviews were held in adult basic education classroom locations while others were conducted at the office or home of the participant. Each participant was reimbursed with $2.50 for one hour of interview time. Each tape was marked with the name, date, category of speaker, county, state, and interviewer's name.

Transcribing of the Tapes

After all the interviews were taped and completed four (4) secretaries with good typing skill and college training in language were trained to transcribe the tapes phonetically. All transcripts were read and checked by the researcher and the interviewer who conducted the interview to check the validity of the transcripts against the original recording.

Transferring the Data on Computer Cards

The data were key punched on computer cards in the following manner.

Tape No.	Word No.	Word Used	Code	Corrected Word

Tape Number: Starting alphabetically according to the state, each state was assigned nine numbers from one to nine in serial order. Tape numbers 1 - 3 being "Rustic" category, tape 4 - 6 "Modern" category, tape 7 - 9 "Cultivated Speakers". The next state followed the pattern in the same manner.

Word Number: This category referred to the serial number of words in each transcript. There were between 3,500 and 4,000 words in each transcript.

Word Used: This term referred to the actual word and manner in which it was used by the participant.

Code: Referred to the symbols developed by the researcher to signify the type of difference from standard English dialect, e. g., code " 1 " referred to grammatical errors and code " 2 " referred to colloquial terms.

Word Corrected: Referred to the words corrected by the researcher according to standard English dialect, explanation of colloquial terms or correct form of grammatical use of words.

After the data were punched on cards in the above manner they were then loaded on magnetic tapes for computer analysis.

Preparation of the Questionnaire

After the collection of data on linguistic structure of the respondents, an additional questionnaire was mailed to contact persons in each state. The questionnaire asked for information regarding the respondent's age, sex, income, source of income, level of employment, education, interpersonal contact, contacts with media and urban contacts. The questionnaire is presented in Appendix E.

Variables Measured

Independent Variables

1. Education

Education is generally considered an important determinant of a person's linguistic structure. The most frequent measure of education is formal classroom education. Education was operationally defined as years of formal schooling a respondent had at the time of the interview. There were seven categories of educational levels in which a respondent was placed. The categories were: (1) None; (2) 1 to 5 years; (3) 6 to 8 years; (4) 9 to 10 years; (5) High School;

(6) Some College, and (7) College.

2. Urban Contact

Quite frequently when rural people come in contact with urban communities new words tend to get incorporated in their linguistic structure. In this study urban contact is defined as frequency of visits to large cities. The index of urban contact varies from very rare visits to very frequent visits to large cities.

3. Media Contact

One of the most important determinants of language seems to be a person's interaction with media. Mass media, in addition to their entertainment and information functions, socialize people and disseminate new words of other speech patterns.

Media contact as defined in this study is an index of exposure to four major media, i.e., newspapers, magazines, radio, and television.

Dependent Variables

1. Functional Vocabulary

Functional vocabulary is defined as the total number of different words used by a respondent during the course of sixty minutes of personal interview.

2. Misused Words

Misused words refers to the words used incorrectly in grammatical context of English language by the respondents. The information regarding the misused words is the frequency of misused words. Appendix I includes the corrected forms of such words.

3. Colloquial Words

Colloquial words are defined as those words which have special connotative or denotative meaning for the respondents of this study. For analytical purpose only, the frequency of colloquial words is used. However, a list of colloquial terms and their explanations is included in Appendix J.

Control Variables

The control variables for this study were: (1) age, (2) sex, and (3) income. These were directly measured variables and are shown in Table 5, Chapter V.

CHAPTER V

ANALYSIS OF THE DATA

Introduction

In this chapter an attempt is made to answer major questions consistent with the objectives of this study. Part one deals with the descriptive data regarding functional vocabulary, colloquial terms, and misuse of words by types of speakers in the various states. In part two an attempt is made to determine the Appalachian linguistic structure from an analytical perspective. Part two also examines the relationships between the Appalachian linguistic structures and certain socio-economic characteristics of the participants.

Part One

Functional Vocabulary

It was hypothesized that rustic speakers have smaller functional vocabularies than modern and cultural speakers. It was also hypothesized that modern speakers have a smaller vocabulary than cultured speakers. These hypotheses were supported by data from six state (Alabama, Mississippi, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and West Virginia).

41

An inspection of Table 1 reveals that variations in the average functional vocabulary are most for rustic speakers, least for cultured speakers and in between for modern speakers across all the states.

TABLE 1. -- Average functional vocabulary by state and type of speaker

State	Rustic	Modern	Cultured	State Average
Alabama	829	839	940	869
Georgia	822	913	902	879
Kentucky	826	785	750	779
Maryland	937	913	990	941
Mississippi	819	844	895	857

Virginia	966	910	970	949
West Virginia	853	894	919	889
Average	846	941	915	875

The subjects in the state of Virginia had the highest functional vocabulary and the subjects in the state of Kentucky had the lowest functional vocabulary. The maximum observed differences among the states was 170 words. The regional variations which are generally implied, at least geographically, for the Appalachian region, do not provide any additional interpretive explanations for the Appalachian linguistic structure.

Figure 1 reveals that the directions hypothesized above are predictable only 72 per cent of the time. In terms of simple inversions and agreements of the propositions, only 43 per cent of the variance can be explained.

Misuse of Words

Since an a priori decision was made regarding the types of speaker, based on the cultural determinants of the usage of language, it can be postulated that the speakers varied in their degree of sophistication in the use of language. As mentioned in the methodology chapter the respondents of the study were classified as Rustic, Modern, and Cultured speakers.

The dimensions which made this classification possible suggest the hypothesis that there will be greater misuse of words by rustic speakers than by modern or cultured speakers. Likewise there will be greater misuse of words by modern speakers than by cultured speakers.

$$\frac{17}{39} = .43 = 43\%$$

It is clear from Table 2 that this hypothesis is upported. However, there are several variations of this pattern which would be noted. In five states the hypothesis that the misuse of words decreases as the linguistic sophistication of the respondents increases was supported. In no states was the proposition refuted in its entirety. Based on the qualitative dimensions of Table 2 as shown in Figure 2, it is apparent that in most states rustic speakers misuse more words than modern and cultured speakers. However, the distinction between modern and cultured speakers is not very obvious. In fact, there are some states in which cultured speakers misuse more words than modern speakers.

There are three states in which cultured speakers misuse words more than do the rustic speakers (Georgia, Maryland, and Ohio).

Although the predictability of the hypothesized direction is 72 per cent, there is only 43 per cent agreement between the data and the hypothesis.

In cross state comparisons, it is clear that the respondents in North Carolina have the highest frequency of misused words and in South Carolina the least frequency of misused words.

Colloquial Words

Formalization of a language is dependent on a standardized semantic meaning. If these forms are similarly absent from a language, the effects are sometimes cataclysmic on communication behavior. However, as is frequently the case, most people use somewhat informal linguistic structures, especially in personal conversations. Consequently, these informal patterns of words become part of a person's language.

It is generally considered that individuals who are educated and have contacts beyond their own immediate reference points are generally less prone to use colloquial terms. Consequently, the three types of speakers included in this study should follow the same pattern. In other words, as the linguistic sophistication of a person increases, the use of colloquial terms generally decreases. This hypothesis is supported as demonstrated by the data in Table 3.

It is obvious that rustic speakers generally use more colloquial terms than do modern or cultured speakers.

It is evident from Figure 3 that rustic speakers use more colloquial words than modern speakers except for those in the states of Kentucky, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania. They also use more colloquial words than do cultured speakers. In the states of Maryland, South Carolina, and Tennessee cultured speakers tend to use more colloquial words than do modern speakers.

It should also be noted that the hypothesis is predictable 85 per cent of the time with 69 per cent agreement.

The use of colloquial terms seems to follow the same pattern as was the case for misused words. Once again respondents in North Carolina showed the highest frequency of colloquial terms whereas those in South Carolina showed the least.

It is interesting to note that respondents in the states of smaller functional vocabulary as well as less frequent misuse of words and colloquial terms. While in Kentucky respondents showed the loswest functional vocabulary, the misuse of words and colloquial terms was rather high.

Corrected Functional Vocabulary

Corrected functional vocabulary is defined as functional vocabulary minus the colloquial and misused terms. Such an index can be taken as a respondent's knowledge of "Standard English." As was hypothesized earlier a person's functional vocabulary increases with an increase in the degree of linguistic sophistication.

Such a hypothesis is supported by the data in Table 4 and in Figure 4 with 92 per cent predictability and 84 per cent agreement, respectively.

Appalachian Dialect: Some Related Variables

Part Two

As indicated in the methodology chapter, there are other variables, beyond the linguistic structure itself, which influence a person's functional vocabulary, misuse of words and colloquialism.

Language, as generally understood, is influenced by a set of socio-cultural environs. The field of socio-linguistics attempts to explain modes of language formation as well as variations in linguistic structure.

Fig. 4. -- Corrected Functional Vocabulary

In this section an attempt is made to identify variables which influence the Appalachian dialect and to test the hypothesis that there is no relationship between the independent variables (education, urban-contact, and media-contact) and the dependent variables (functional vocabulary, frequency of misused words and frequency of colloquial terms).

The analysis utilizes the product-moment correlation as well as zero order and first-order partial correlations.

The data presented in Table 5 reveal the correlations among all the variables. The dependent variables are functional vocabulary, misuse of words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary. Corrected functional vocabulary, as may be recalled from the earlier discussion, is total functional vocabulary minus misuse of words and colloquial terms. An interesting pattern emerges in terms of relationships among these variables (Table 6 and Figure 5). Functional vocabulary is directly and positively related to misused words and colloquial terms. The general trend suggests that the more words a person uses the more likely will he misuse words as well as use more colloquial terms.

The finding which seems more important, however, is the high degree of relationship between the misuse of words and the use of colloquial terms. These findings suggest that if one misuses words, he is very likely to use colloquial terms, or if one uses colloquial terms, he is also likely to misuse words. While these two aspects of the Appalachian dialect should be viewed with considerable caution, they do suggest that these factors are interdependent. It is also clear that the corrected functional vocabulary is directly and positively related to the total functional vocabulary and negatively related to the misuse of words and colloquial terms.

Relationship Between Dependent and Independent Variables

Before examining the relationship between the dependent and independent variables, it is necessary to understand the relationship of interdependence among the independent variables themselves as depicted in Table 7.

TABLE 7. -- Zero order correlation among the independent variables.

	Education	Urban Contact	Media Contact
Urban Contact	.41	--	107
Media Contact	.52	.11

Table 7 shows that education is highly related to urban and media contact. However, the relationship between urban contact and media contact is very low. It can be postulated that the relationship in such a situation is as shown in Figure 6.

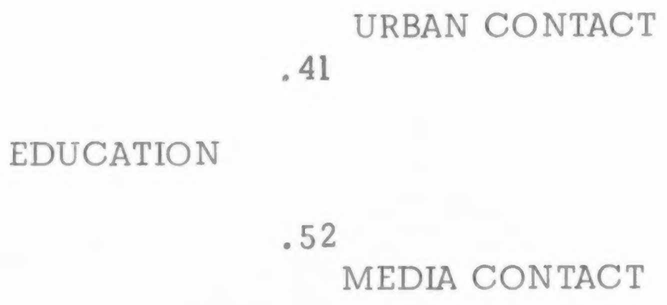

Fig. 6. --Interrelationships Among the Independent Variables

While the interdependence in such a case may be understandable, one can argue that none of these variables is dependent on the dependent variables under consideration. Similarly, it can be conceptualized that the direct dependence of these variables on the dependent variables is not very probable.

As far as the relationships among independent and dependent variables are concerned, it is obvious from Table 8 that the most positive relationship which emerges is the relationship between education and the dependent variables. The data indicate that functional vocabulary is either weakly related to education or not related to it at all.

The relationship of education to misuse of words and the use of colloquial terms is in the hypothesized direction. The hypothesis that education is positively associated with functional vocabulary is supported when one examines the relationship between education and corrected functional vocabulary. The original relationship between education and functional vocabulary can be considered distorted from the evidence presented in Table 8. It appears that education is directly related to the corrected vocabulary.

A surprising finding is the relationship between urban contact and the four dependent variables. It is obvious that no relationship emerbes clearly as is evidenced from the correlation coefficients. Although, the directions are supported as hypothesized, the evidence does not suggest as much impact from the urban contact as would be generally expected. Most likely the inferential causal sequence which was suggested from education is operating in this case.

The finding on media participation partially supports the hypothesized directions as shown in Table 8. While media contact is not significantly related to functional vocabulary and misused words, it is related to colloquial terms and the corrected functional vocabulary. It is suggested that the more contact an Appalachian has with the media (newspaper, radio, television, and magazine), the less likely he will use colloquial words and the more likely he will use "standard English."

Control Variables

Table 10 shows the correlations that were computed between the independent variables (education, urban contact and media contact) and the dependent variables (functional vocabulary, misused words and colloquial terms) with the effect of the control variables age, sex, and income removed.

First order partial correlations did not provide any additional information except in the case of income. Income showed a high degree of relationship with functional vocabulary, but it is actually influenced through an indirect route. The general statement, supported from the first order partials, is: education increases income and income increases functional vocabulary. In case of age as a variable, it appeared that younger people have more education than older people. Sex did not appear to be related to functional vocabulary. A general belief about the Appalachian Region is that men are more educated than women, but such a notion was not supported by the findings of this study.

CHAPTER VI

SUMMARY

Purpose and Methods

The purpose of this research was to:

1. Determine the linguistic structure of the Appalachian Region in terms of functional vocabulary, misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary. An overall list of misused words, their corrected forms, colloquial terms and their explanations was developed.

2. Determine the relationship between education, urban contact and media contact and functional vocabulary, misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary.

3. Determine the relationship of age, sex, and income to functional vocabulary, misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary.

To determine the linguistic structure of the Appalachian region nine interviewees from each of thirteen states were chosen according to selected criteria. The nine interviewees were classified as rustic, modern and cultured speakers. The term rustic referred to speakers older in age with minimum or no education, the term modern was used for persons with high school education or its equivalent and younger in age, and the term cultured referred to speakers with a college education or its equivalent with no age restrictions. Four native Appalachians, two male and two female, interviewers were trained to conduct the interviews throughout the region. An hour long interview with each of the participants was conducted, and a total of 117 hours of spoken discourse was taped. Each tape was transcribed and all words from the transcripts were punched on computer cards. The data consisted of 471,656 words.

Data were transferred to magnetic tapes yielding the following analysis: (1) an alphabetized list of words and their frequency by respondent; (2) an overall alphabetized list of the data with word frequency for the region; (3) an overall alphabetized word frequency list of misused words and their correct forms; (4) an overall alphabetized word frequency list of colloquial terms and their explanations. From the tables thus obtained a list of corrected functional vocabulary was prepared by state and types of speaker (functional vocabulary minus misused words + colloquial terms).

Selection of Participants

One Adult Basic Education teacher, supervisor, or state director was initially contacted by telephone in each of the thirteen Appalachian states of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Maryland, New York, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginina. After the initial telephone contact each person was mailed a letter confirming the telephone conversation along with the criteria for the selection of the sample respondents. The selection of paricipants was completed by the contact person according to the criteria, and a time, date, and place was set for the interviews. There were nine participants from each state--three in each category, rustic, modern, and cultured.

Collection of Data

After completing all necessary arrangements, the researcher along with the four interviewers visited each state. Hour long interviews were scheduled with each participant. During a period of one hour, each participant talked for approximately 40 minutes at a speed of approximately seventy-five words per minute thus providing a sample of approximately 3,000 words per interview. Following each interview tapes were marked with the name, date, category of speaker, county, state, and the interviewer's name.

Findings and Conclusions

Functional Vocabulary

It was hypothesized that in general rustic speakers have a smaller functional vocabulary than modern and cultured speakers, and modern speakers have a smaller vocabulary than cultured speakers. This hypothesis was only supported by data obtained in six of the 13 states (Alabama, Mississippi, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and West Virginia). In the other seven states the hypothesis was not supported by the findings. The data revealed that the directions hypothesized were predictable 72 percent of the time. However, in terms of simple inversions and agreements, only 43 per cent of the variance could thus be explained.

The variations in average functional vocabulary were greatest among rustic speakers and least for the cultured speakers across all states. Respondents in the state of Virginia had the highest functional vocabulary. The lowest functional vocabulary was found in the state of Kentucky. The maximum observed difference in functional vocabulary among the states was 170 words.

The sub-regional differences which are generally implied, at least geographically, for the Appalachian region provide no additional interpretive explanations for the Appalachian linguistic structure.

Misuse of Words

The respondents in this study were broadly classified as rustic, modern and cultured speakers. According to dimensions which made this classification possible, rustic speakers will misuse more words than modern speakers and modern speakers will misuse more words than cultured speakers.

As a whole this hypothesis was supported. In most of the states rustic speakers misused more words than modern and cultured speakers. In five of the states participants displayed a gradually decreasing misuse of words as their linguistic sophistication increased. In no state was the hypothesis refuted in its entirety. The distinction between modern and cultured speakers was not clearly defined by the data. In fact, in certain states cultured speakers misused more words than did modern speakers.

In three states cultured speakers misused words more than did rustic speakers (Alabama, Maryland, and Ohio). Among all states the respondents in North Carolina had the highest frequency of misused words.

Colloquial Words

The hypothesis that the more highly educated individuals would be less prone to use colloquial terms was generally supported by the findings of this study.

Rustic speakers used more colloquial words than did modern speakers in all states except Kentucky, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania. They used more colloquial words than the cultured speakers in all states. In the states of Maryland, South Carolina, and Tennessee, cultured speakers used more colloquial words than rustic and modern speakers. The hypothesized direction was found to be predictable 85 per cent of the time.

The use of colloquial words appeared to follow the same pattern as the misuse of words. Respondents in North Carolina showed the highest frequency of colloquial terms, with South Carolina using the fewest colloquial terms. Respondents in the states of North Carolina and Virginia demonstrated a higher functional vocabulary and at the same time also showed higher misuse of words and higher use of colloquial terms. On the other hand in Mississippi and South Carolina the respondents' functional vocabulary was smaller and less frequent misuse of words and use of colloquial terms occurred. Respondents in Kentucky showed the lowest functional vocabulary and misuse of words and use of colloquial terms was relatively high. No discernible pattern was evident for sub-regional variations.

Corrected Functional Vocabulary

Corrected functional vocabulary was defined as functional vocabulary minus the colloquial and misused words. This index was used as a respondent's knowlege of "Standard English." It was hypothesized that a person's corrected functional vocabulary would increase with an increase in the degree of his linguistic sophistication. This hypothesis was supported with 92 per cent predictability and 80 per cent agreement, respectively.

As hypothesized in the beginning of the study, other variables beyond the linguistic structure itself influence a person's functional vocabulary, misuse of words, and colloquialism. The analysis of the data for this part of the investigation showed an interesting pattern in terms of relationship among these variables. Functional vocabulary was found to be positively related to misused words and colloquial terms.

The findings suggested that the more a person used words the more likely he was to misuse words and use more colloquial terms. There was a high degree of relationship between the misuse of words and the use of colloquial terms. The findings suggested that if one misuses words, he is also very likely to use colloquial terms or if he uses colloquial terms he is also likely to misuse words. These findings relating to the Appalachian dialect should be viewed with considerable caution; they suggest that both factors are interdependent. On the other hand, the corrected functional vocabulary was positively related to the total functional vocabulary and negatively related to the misuse of words and colloquial terms.

In examining the relationship between independent and dependent variables the most significant relationships which emerged were the relationships between education and misused words, colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary. It was also clear from the analysis that there was very little relationship between functional vocabulary and education.

No significant relationship was found between urban contact and the three dependent variables. However, the hypothesized directions were supported. Similarly, the findings on media contact were not significantly related to functional vocabulary and misused words; however, media contact was related to the use of colloquial terms and corrected functional vocabulary. It appeared that the more contact an Appalachian had with the media (newspaper, radio, television, and magazine) the less likely he would be to use colloquial words and the more likely he would use standard English.

Control Variables

A first order partial correlation was computed between the independent variables (education, urban contact and media contact) and the dependent variables (functional vocabulary, misused words and colloquial terms) with the effect of the control variables age, sex and income removed.

First order partial correlations did not provide any additional information except in the case of income. Income was found to be related to functional vocabulary, but was through an indirect route. The general statement, supported from the first order partials, is education increases income and income increases functional vocabulary. In case of age as a variable, it appeared that younger people have more education than older people. Sex was not related to functional vocabulary in any of the analyses. The general belief that Appalachian men are more educated than women was not supported by the findings of the study.

The total number of words used in the study was 471,656. (1) There was a total of 6,129 misused words which constituted an overall average of 6 per cent misuse of words. (2) The total number of colloquial terms used was 13,816 constituting an average of 13.4 per cent use of colloquial words. Combined percentages (6% + 13.4%) gave a figure of more than 19 per cent use of either incorrect forms of the English language or the use of colloquial terms.

Thus a difference or deviation of 19 per cent from the "Standard English" leads us to believe that there is a distict pattern or linguistic structure that exists throughout the Appalachian Region without any sub-regional differences within the region.

Implications for Theory

Social structures reinforce the development of a restricted style of language which, among other features, is more socially than conceptually oriented, requires its users to share a range of implicit meanings and appears limited and stereotyped in its expressive alternatives.

The geographic isolation and lack of transportaiton in Appalachia have developed such limited and sterotyped ranges of implicit meanings and the expressive alternatives. An implication of this study is the desirability of providing an alphabetized list of implicit meanings and their explanations outside the region, a list of misused words and their correct forms and colloquial terms and their explanations.

If the restricted code is emphasized over a more concept oriented form of language during early formative years, it may eventually inhibit progress in adult basic education classes where the later form of language is the primary mode of instruction.

Language differences have often been confused with deficiencies. The existence of these confusions have direct implications for the disadvantaged, isolated white adults of the Appalachian Region. Too frequently the social differences in an individual's speech are described and explained by the level of distinction in the phonological features, vocabulary size, colloquial terms, inflectional capabilities, and grammatical structure. Thus, the implication here is that the distinctive language behavior of Appalachian people is more a function of communicative experiences imposed by social experiences in general and by family life in particular.

Another implication of this study is that the choice of dialect is a matter of social appropriateness and expediency rather than one of right versus wrong or good versus bad.

Implications for Practice

An implication for practice related to the future use of the alphabetized list of the functional vocabulary of Appalachian adults. Application and use of this vocabulary should enable educators to improve the quality of adult basic education by making materials more meaningful, understandable, and relevant to the lives and interests of students.

It is recommended that the information on colloquial terms and misused words be made available to teachers in adult basic education in the region. Such knowledge should help them develop an awareness of colloquial terms and their meaning and the misused words and their correct forms so that they can better understand how to teach language in the Appalachian Region.

Another practical use of the information developed in this study is to provide adult basic education students knowledge regarding the dialect of standard English and its relationship to that of their own dialect, to prevent the development of a more restricted form of speech among individuals in Appalachia.

In compensatory programs of language instruction, the adult must learn alternative systems of linguistic usage and that instruction will be best focused upon the intersections of an individual's current language and the target language.
